GEORGE ADE'S OFFER.

A local newspaper man had some pictures made just before Christmas and when he dealt them around among his friends everybody told him that they looked more like George Ade than they did like himself.

The local scribe then bundled one off to Ade to tell him of the libel that was going around on one or the other or both of them. "We may neither of us be handsome," he told Ade, "but that is no reason why people should knock, and say that we look like each other."

Ade wrote back and said that the picture did remind him of himself, and that he felt that the should exchange a few sympathetic letters.

"For a time," wrote the author of "The College Widow," "I boarded with an old lady who would begin weeping whenever she looked at me. She explained that I looked just like her dead cousin. She never told me how long he had been dead before he began to resemble me."

"I am sending you a photograph which you may need some time in order to prove an alibi. If it should prove that the resemblance is absolutely deceiving. I can get you a job, going in front of the curtain to accept responsibility for some of the snide dramas now being played under my name."
